This community arts center hosts a weekend farmers market (10am to 1pm Saturday, October to May) and an artisan/vendor market (10am to 4pm Saturday and Sunday, year-round), and is a hub for local artists, small businesses (including some locavore food vendors), and practitioners of yoga and other healing arts. Delicious discoveries include a brewer, a baker and wood-fired pizza maker.

A diploma mill is a company that awards unaccredited degrees and provides either an inferior education or no education at all. If you're considering attending an online school, learn as much about diploma mills as you can. This article will teach you how to spot them, how to avoid them, and how to take action if you've been a victim of a diploma mill's false advertising. If you want your degree to be accepted by employers and other schools, your best bet is to enroll in a school accredited by one of the six regional accreditors. Your degree may still be considered acceptable if it is from a school accredited by another organization recognized by the United States Department of Education (USDE) and/or the Council for Higher Education Accreditation (CHEA), such as the Distance Education Training Council. Being accredited by an agency approved by the USDE or CHEA adds legitimacy to the school. However, not all unaccredited schools can be considered "diploma mills." Some new schools are undergoing the lengthy process required to receive accreditation. Other schools have chosen not to seek formal accreditation because they do not want to follow outside regulations or because they do not believe it is necessary for their organization. In order for a school to be considered a diploma mill, it must award degrees with little or no work required. There are thousands of fake schools in the billion-dollar diploma mill industry. However, most diploma mills fall into one of two categories: Diploma mills that openly sell degrees for cash - These "schools" are straight-up with their clients. They offer customers a degree for cash. Both the diploma mill and the recipient know that the degrees are illegitimate. Many of these schools do not operate under a single name. Instead, they let clients select the name of any school they choose. Diploma mills that pretend to be real schools - These companies are more dangerous. They pretend that they offer legitimate degrees. Students are often allured by promises of life experience credit or fast-track learning. They may have students do minimal work, but they usually award degrees in a very short amount of time (a few weeks or a few months). Many students "graduate" from these diploma mills thinking that they have earned a real degree. You can find out if a school is accredited by an organization approved by the Department of Education by searching an online database. You should also keep an eye out for these diploma mill warning signs: Prospective students are bombarded with extreme promises about the degree program. Students are given one bill for the degree instead of being charged tuition for each class or credit hour. The school's website has no phone number. The school's address is a P.O. Box or apartment number. Promotional materials focus heavily on credit for life experience. The school does not have a .edu web address. There are no names of deans, directors, or professors on the website. The school's name is very similar to the name of a traditional, well-known school. Degrees are awarded in a very short period of time - only a few weeks or months. The school claims to be accredited by an organization that is not listed as an accreditor approved by the Department of Education. Using a diploma mill degree to get a job could lose you your job, and your respect, in the workplace. Additionally, some states have laws that limit the use of diploma mill degrees. In Oregon, for example, prospective employees must inform employers if their degree is not from an accredited school. If you've been deceived by a diploma mill's false advertising, immediately request a refund of your money. Send a registered letter to the company's address explaining the deception and asking for a full refund. Make a copy of the letter you send for your own records. Chances are low that they'll send the money back, but mailing the letter will provide you with the documentation you may need in the future. File a complaint with the Better Business Bureau. Filing will help warn other potential students about the diploma mill school. It takes just a few minutes and can be done completely online. You should also file a complaint with your state attorney general's office. The office will read complaints and may choose to investigate the diploma mill school. It is difficult for any organization to put together a complete list of degree mills because many new schools are created each month. It is also difficult for organizations to consistently tell the difference between a diploma mill and a school that is simply unaccredited. Oregon's Student Assistance Commission maintains the most comprehensive list of unaccredited schools. However, it is not an exhaustive list. Be aware that the schools listed are not all necessarily diploma mills. Also, a school should not be considered legitimate just because it is not on the list. Photograph: Paul Wagtoucez

Mille-Feuille Bakery Café

Pierre Herm acolyte Olivier Dessyn, who fell in love with New York City during a vacation here, moved from Paris and opened this humble shop in Greenwich Village last May. Inspired by NYU's Elmer Holmes Bobst Library across the street, Dessyn named his patisserie after the mille-feuille, a layered dessert ($3.90) that reminded the toque of a book on its side. The baked goods are all traditional French—macarons ($2.10), cheese brioche ($2.90) and chocolate sables ($2.50)—but the real standout is Dessyn's croissant ($2.25). The iconic crescent-shaped delicacy ranks among the city's best: The crisp, dark-brown shell shatters on the first bite, revealing stretchable layers of silky, buttery pastry. Windmills are a common outback sight, but this 35ft Comet is worth a look for its massive girth.

This Upper Diamond grocer was established in 1933 by John Denis. For the past 25 years it's been run by Kirk Watkins, who originally started working at the store at the age of 16. The store's produce is 100 percent organic, most of it sourced from California farms. The bulk bins contain over 800 items, including flours, granolas and herbs. All the breads are baked on-site, and there's an extensive gluten-free section to boot. In particular, the Mill has developed a cult following for its nut butters, each roasted and ground in-store (on Denis's original equipment!) and available by the jar or in bulk. Thank you This article has been sent to A food mill is a kitchen device used for grinding or puréeing foods such as soups, sauces, or mashed potatoes. It may be used during canning or making preserves to produce a smooth puree without seeds, skins, or stems. It can be used with hot or cold food. It may also be called a rotary food mill. A food mill is typically a manually powered device with a hand crank on top. It is shaped like a wide-mouthed inverted cone with legs or projections to set over a bowl and be held stable while you are pouring in the food to be sauced and turning the crank. The bottom is perforated and it strains the food being ground into the receiving bowl. There is a grinding plate attached to the crank. As you turn the crank, the food is mashed down onto a perforated disk at the bottom of the food mill, where it is strained through the sieve holes into the bowl you have placed under it. Food mills often come with interchangeable perforated sieving discs for achieving finer or coarser purées. If you reverse the direction of the crank after you've extracted as much as possible, the seeds, skins and other debris are brought up to the top of the grinding plate. Then you can easily invert the food mill over a trash or compost can and discard the debris. You can use a food mill to make applesauce or tomato sauce, with the advantage of being able to add hot, unpeeled or unskinned fruits or vegetables to the mill and produce a puree without the seeds or skins. This leads to less food waste than there would be if you were peeling or deseeding. Often only a tiny amount of debris and seeds is left after milling. This can be composted or discarded. Food mills can be used to make baby food or purée for people who are on soft food restrictions for chewing or swallowing difficulties. Duchesse potatoes or other puréed items can be made with a food mill or a potato ricer. Food mills are simple, mechanical, non-electric pieces of kitchen equipment. They can usually be washed in the dishwasher. They can be used with hot or cold food and soft, semi-solid, or mostly liquid foods. Food processors do not strain out seeds and skins. If you process a tomato with skin and seeds in a food processor, you can end up with a gritty texture as they are chopped up but not liquefied. A food mill is effective for straining and ensuring the sauce doesn't have gritty bits of seeds and skin. Food processors are more appropriate for solid foods, which cannot be effectively ground with a food mill, such as cheese or nuts. The food ground in a food mill must be soft, often being steamed, baked, or boiled before being processed. Buy Food Mills at Amazon.com
